noes were in action and a terrific African earthquake was reported. Quickly he got into communication with the Cal-cutta plant, on the other hemisphere, which was at that moment exposed to-ward Canopus, and gave them the same

Instructions he had given Mars.
Immediately on finishing this, he instructed the New Jersey men at the plant to rig up a specially planned attracting contrivance. In ten hours just as soon as Canopus was in direct line with New York and the Western Hemi-the coast plant that a frightfully powerful current was operating through the magnetic "pool" which had been constructed to trap the deadly force sent from Canopus.

Elverson quickly got on a train and went there, together with Bardi and Watres. Inside of the colessal frundryshed in an abandoned engine pit of huge size, was the temporary holder which Elverson's ingenuity had contrived. On the dial of the meter in front of it was a curious sight. The finger had jammed against the pin which marked the highest figure the meter could record, and was almost bent double, so intense was the electrical action.

I do not know that any one knows and board wanted—Rooms and source from Canopus expressed astonishment.

I' do not know that any one knows anything about such an individual or such threats," it said.

"Exactly," replied Elverson. "That is just what I thought. Now, I should ask that you bring the matter before the public and the proper government, and see what can be done. It is a vital matter to us, and you will earn our deep gratitude if you comply with our request."

After a number of more conversed astonishment.

WHEN this feeling rose to considerable height, and Elverson began to be criticised, he determined to take decisive steps.

Calling up Mars, he gave some meaning the stranger of the enemy's gardeness of the stranger of the apparatus to Elverson and his assistant, they merely continuing to act as interpreters.

After exchanging courtesies, Elverson broached his mission to the scientist who was speaking from Canopus.

"For over a year we have been threatened by some one on your planet—situated on your southern hemisphere." he said. "He told us that he wanted all the gold on our planet, or else he would plunge our whole solar system into the sun. We were forced by sheer necessity to either invent some means of resistance or else revolutionize our society by complying.

"We did succeed in resisting his enormous skill in attempting to destroy our planet and saved our companion planet. Then he succeeded in destroying Saturn, after which we decided that there was only one thing to do—to navigate hitherward and endeavor to restrain your fellow inhabitant from further depredations.

"We had learned that Achernar had also been persecuted, and we first sought them to join us, after making a somewhat perilous journey all the way from the northern hemisphere of the heavens.

"We are addressing you to ask that you locate your rapacious and ambificously destructive inhabitants and stop him from transgressing on the rights of other spheres."

They voice from Canopus expressed as—

A month later, not hearing anything more, Elverson once more called Canopus, and finally got an answer.

Elverson was fascinated at the opportunity to discover the nature of the new wave, and experimented with it far into the night. The next morning, when the reporters sought a statement, he said triumphantly:

"We've won again! Caropus tried the same thing that succeeded so well with poor Saturn—a power—wave which induces incandescence at centers of gravity, and thereby explodes the planet it reaches. Fortunately, we have been able to intercept it—and, now—what do you think?

"Last night I discovered that it will drive metors, and can be transmitted any distance by a wireless system.

"In other words we can run a great many of our factories and plants by free power as long as Canopus is kind enough to continue sending the current."

All the earth and Mars laughed at WHEN this feeling rose to consid-force, and lauded Elverson; but he and his staff went to work in great earnest, for the hardest work was still before them.

The first thing was to use part of Canopus' own current to help strengthen the screen shutting off harmful currents, which, owing to the increased proximity of the hostile sphere, had not proved quite strong enough. With the knowledge gained from Canopus' current, Bardi succeeded in planning for the entrance only of a low-power telephone current from Canopus through our defensive screen.

By this time the three worlds were as close to Canopus as was both advisable and convenient, and the hemisphere on which Canopus operated was now fully facing them. Elverson slept in his tower, with operators on duty all night, and was ready for any emergency. But Canopus spun around again, putting her greedy inhabitant out of sight on the other hemisphere, without anything happening.

Immediately Elverson started vigorously to work on his plan of campaign.
